Why Do We Sing What We Sing?

Worship in the Monastic Tradition

When the church became an institution with all the security and protection of the state, church life became more structured and worship took on a formal liturgy. There were other less positive effects, as well. The rich and powerful dominated the life of the church. Soon, abuse cropped into the church's leadership as bishops competed with each other for prestigious positions. But the real threat to the church was, because being a Christian no longer involved societal risk, many people began to slack off in their spiritual lives. All of this convinced many of the faithful that security and comfortable lifestyles were the greatest enemies of the church. Thousands of men and women wanting to live a more intense spiritual life, less preoccupied with the affairs of the world, fled to the Egyptian desert to live alone in caves. These desert hermits sought a deeper communion with God through a life of solitude, prayer, and contemplation. Living a monastic life in solitude progressed for some into living together in a monastic community. In the monastery, each day was an ordered routine: a prayer, worship, manual labor, and rest. The monks believed that prayer was the work God had called them to perform. Seven times a day, they gathered for common prayer known as the Daly Office. Soon thereafter, music became part of their life of prayer. Like its communal lifestyle, the focus of music in the monastery was on uniting individual voices into one harmonious sound known as chant — singing simple songs of prayer over and over again...
